Frenks of a Steer.

The upper streets of New York, on Saturday last, were held in terrorem by a herd of Texan steers of undisputed bravery and skill. Eleven long borns were originally numbered in the attacking party; but three came to a bloody end before the fall of night. A look from a station house door discovered a cloud of dust along Lexington avecue and a crewd of beoting and excited people bordering it.

With an intuitive mistrust of pelicemen the beasts insisted on having their own way, and marched in a body to First avenue and turned down town. A great crowd had gathered by this rime, and their presence, together with that of the police force, greatly excited the animals. During the march down First avenue one of them broke through the surrounding crowd and dashed away ahead and was soon out

There was no resistance offered to steer No. 2 when he made a dish for liberty; but a por-tion of the crowd followed at his heels, yelling like demons as they went. There is a large yard attached to the brewery, near Fourth avenue, and this was seized without ceremony to imprison the animals. Once within the enclosure and the gates shut upon them they lay down to sleep, and a lazier and more harmless looking lot of constants it would be hard instant. The two escaped ones, however, were making a reputation which excited great interest in the captives, and crowds gathered around the picket lanca of the brewery yard and spent loans there gazing at the imprisoned brutes. Steer No. 1, the first to break away, and who began his course by starting up avenue A, was not look in gathering a peripatetic audience. After a short run he halted to rest him self. When the meb came toward him he started up the avenue again on a serpentine course from gutter to gutter, butting a wagon here, a lampost there and anything and every thing in his way. The few people in front of him sought shelter in time to escape the fary of the beast, which was in great measure due to the cries and missiles of the pursuing crowd. At Eighty winth street his steership turned into a vacuat lot. There ropes were passed over his horns and an effort made to fasten him to a lamppost on the street corner. While the men who had lassoed the steer should be a control of this by a single application of this While the men who had lassoed the steer were tying the rope the animal took a fresh start and made off with the rope, turning his captors heels over head. Across the open lots down toward Eighty sixth street he scampered, whisking his tail and rousing the dust to his evident satisfaction. At Eighty sixth street and Second avenue he again entrapped himself in an erclosure and was speedily surrounded by his pursuers. A pound or two more of lead in homospathic doses was administered, but withcut any other result than to irritate the brute and cause him to howl and turn a threatening lock upon his followers. A Mr. Barban, who lives is the neighborhood, brought a rifle from his house and with steady nim sent a ball into the steer's forehead.— The wounded animal fell prescrate, and a cheer rese from the crowd, which pressed closer, when danger seemed past. The beast was only stnaned, however, for in a moment or two he rose again, sprang over the fence on the Eighty street side of the er closure and was off like the wind. A purse with a child in a hand carriage had an almost miraculous ecope from death a moment later.

They were directly in the path of the flying beast and he was close upon them. The cries of the crowd behind gave the girl warning just in time to allow her to jump into the first area and leave the child to its fate. The furious beast slackened his pace as he approached the tiny carriage, and, without halting, made sevcral circuits of it, eyeing it closely, and with his head prepared to dash it to pieces. Then, as if he did not deem it worthy of attack, he bolted away again toward avenus A.

At the juscion of that thoroughfare and Nacty-first street he halted in the open lots occupied by a stonecutter named Thomas Os-borne, who, with his brother William, was on hand when the steer arrived. William immedistely open fire on him from behind a pile of blue stones. The bullets appeared to irritate the beast, but not to harm him.

A man named Harrington was standing near Osboree while he was firing and considered it great sport until the beast discovered his tor-menter and made for him. Osborne and Har-rington, seeing there was no chance to escape, grappled each other and began a wallz to see who should present a frost, or rather a rear to the attack. The chares fell to Osborne, and he rose about five feet from the ground and fell again upon his companion. The steer trampled the prostrate men for a moment and theo darted across the street to worry a horse which had been unbitched from a sand cart and tied to a telegraph pole. After a short war dance around the emaciated and inaccent looking horse the steer made a dash at him, raised him bodily upon his head and almost disembowelled him. The poor beas: gave a roar, rolled over in agony and looked as though he would never be of service to his owner again. At this stage he took it into his head to go to the river side. Down to the foot of Ninety-first street and overboad he went like a flash. The crowd still tollowed, and a shot now and then served to increase the excitement but in no way to is jure the steer or impede his progress. Even in the water he preserved his PLATED WARE! fighting spirit. Henry Baxter, a boatman at We have this day received a nice line of the the foot of Eighty fifth street, jumped into a fighting spirit. Henry Bexter, a boatman at small boat, with lass) and pistel aboard. Approaching the heast he fired and tossed his rope. As soon as the beast discovered that he was be ing followed, he turned toward the best and endearored with his horns to overturn it. suffered the disadvantage of having no foothold, and was unable to do any harm. B. xter. alarmed at this unexpected turn of affairs, se zad his ears and made for shore. The steer, following his example, made a landing shead of him. He made his appear-trucks stood backed up against the platform, waiting to receive ice, when the steer appeared upon the seene. His first move was to dive his head under the stemach of the nearest horse in the line and raise him from the ground. The steer's horrs had passed between the horse's limbs to the opposite side of his body. and his truck rested on the back of the steer's neck, so that he was more frightened than hurt by the attack. He raised himself on his hind legs, however, pranced as much as his harnessed condition would allow and caused a pario among his companions.— This was fon for the steer who galloped about, This was fun for the steer who galloped about, now and then amusing himself by goring them, Three of the horses were badly injured, and one it is thought, will die. Herman Rosenthal, of No. 349 East Sixtieth street, was in the vicitity at the time and collided with the tip of the steer's right horn. He veered from his path at an angle of forty five degrees and an elevation of about four feet, and arrived on terra firms again with a loss of a portion of his trousers and four front teeth. His injuries were not serious, however, for he spent the balance of the day searching for the owner of the steer as a primary step toward a suit for damages.

After tiring of the horses and Mr. Rosenthal the steer passed into an enclosure formed by a fence and a number of trucks at Ninety-fourth street and the East River and there stopped, as if to rest. The crowd quickly gathered and a fow useless shots were discharged.
